Passing of the Able Seaman.

The fate of the able seaman is indelibly attached to the sailing ship, and the fate of this ship is indicated by this table from the London Economist, comparing the number of steam and sail ships on the register of Great Britain and Ireland:

Year.	Steam.	Sail.	Total.
1840	87,830	2,680,330	2,768,260
1860	454,330	4,204,360	4,658,690
1880	2,723,470	3,851,040	6,574,510
1900	7,207,610	2,096,490	9,304,100
1909	10,284,810	1,303,060	11,587,870

This table shows the startling development of steamships by cars and sails 30 years. A like one could be compiled for every seafaring nation. Thus, during the year 1913, the shipyards of the United States turned out but 73 sail vessels, as against 1003 steam vessels, while in the year 1910, 127 sail vessels were built, as against 536 steamers.

This able seaman, the product of 2000 years of battling with the sea in open boats propelled by oars and sails and then in ships propelled by sails alone, is passing because of the superior efficiency of the steam vessel, where no hand is needed to break out or take in sail. In a like manner, man's best and most affectionate friends, the horse, is losing his place because of the superior utility of the motor machine.

The efficiency of steam as compared with sail is as four to one. So far as concerns the coasts of the United States, it is predicted that the completion of the Panama canal will force out of the long voyages around Cape Horn—the last stand of the sailor—this class of ships. Steam is even supplanting the sail schooner in the fisheries in United States waters, and the motor boat that of the sail and row boat in rivers and harbors.

The century of progress before which the able seaman has given way may be indicated thus:
